WELCOME TO THE WILDLIFE EXPLOITATION PRESERVE

---

I'm running out of ways to say tree.

When I stand on the marbled creek, ice smothering the flood beneath itself, I remember the high water mark on my wallpaper—submerged chandelier, mildewed coffee table. A freight car floating down Broad Street, one upended caboose, water shuddering through stained glass.

Imagine the anthracite veins pooled shut.

This was before silicon saplings and rubberized roots—the endless autumnal. Limbs that won't snap, a new model of seed installed each year.

I'm the one to blame here.
I got tired of lugging the oxygen tanks from the cabin to the creek, grew bored of waiting for my mother to die. So I dug a shoreline for her, backhoegnawed earth, its metallic maw. I ran a vein to her nose, wires cased in a fake tree. It's amazing what we'll do for the mundane, to feel our toes silt through sand. As long as I close my eyes, the hallucinations are close enough. Maybe I'll run into my father in passing, ask advice on leaving; maybe I'll take a job at the turnpike, climb salt licks and clear ribbonway with my plow, hand out Christmas candy bags at the county prison. What is winter good for if not the arrogance? The bravado of indoor plumbing, fawn tracks rewritten with bulldozer's lace. The zinc plant's smokestacks choking back fumes.

Oil wells perched, craning the horizon.
Ospreys floating overhead, kiting a breath of wind belly-up.

THE BOY SHOEBOXES A KINGFISHER

I've been warned not to impose meaning on the meaningless, not to treat my experience as an inkblot: how, when I was still a boy—before the animals revealed themselves as a jumble of blood and bones, before the sky was a smudged watercolor of tempera, mud, and milkweed—the small kingfisher I cradled, sick from sewage water, muck crusted on tousled plumage, was just a bird that could not be saved. Like the bud dislocated from bramble, or the berry pestled in my too-innocent palms, the kingfisher's wild eyes were not a message, its life not sacrificed for grand premonition, its death no warning of separation, of autumn's coming indifference. I try to remember only this:
my small red hands, fragile beak, fragile wing.

KAKAWANGWA (HE-WHO-WALKS-HIS-LIFE-BITTER)

---

The grandfather that's left speaks of his old Indian tribe dissolving to sawdust—war paint and feathered headbands now casino reservations and tax-emption:
poor people on poor soil.

He tells me of buffalo-skull mountains, blankets that shivered at his touch, a bayonet kissing the crook of his back, needling him forward.
And you listen here, he rasps, we never had a chance.

The grandfather that remains eats scrapple at the Lunchbox, a local diner: red-tinged skin resting on white marble counters, lottery ticket in hand.

Kakawangwa knows what exile means:
His town named after his tribe, neither remembered. A rusted-out Hudson languishes in his yard, a capless mouthwash bottle, a room singing with radio static.

A dead history too tired to live, a heart murmur that makes him scared to die.

CADILLAC

Near the forest-edge a '62 Cadillac slumbers in a decades-long sleep: sun-bleached blue paint, red velvet bench seats, rust webbing from the undercarriage.

My father kicks at the tires, staring hard at the gnarled cloth-top. The tire's white walls wheeze and shudder as they meet the steel-toed tip of my father's boot.

He pretends to be composed.
He fumbles around inside the tirewell and a key falls into the dirt. The engine stutters, groans, and submits into murmur.

White taillights light at the tip of tailfins.
This won't take long, my father says, handcranking the window shut. I watch him go, sunlight bending off sheetmetal creases.

Being dead is something he's never gotten used to.

AFTER

Here lies my zombied morning corpse, drool-slathered and unshaven on stolen pillows.

Grapefruit rinds, tufts of cat hair and empty beer-can pyramids serve as markers to the bath, a litany of little reminders that I am still here,

I still exist.

Outside, the landscape is frost-stippled:
fog wafts above the silent, unbroken lake surface. There used to be life here, beneath these waters—corner churches and general stores now ghosted, minnows flitting through blown-out shadows.

I enter my Oldsmobile, headlights bleeding into mist.
This oversized casket purrs and the lake croons for me.
I ease the throttle, become enveloped by dawning fog, swallowed into the lake's open mouth—

INCARCERATED

In my final week at Laurel Highlands Prison, I was asked to create a mental diagnosis for a problem prisoner, to give a label to the erratic inmate: slackjawed with chafed lips and crusted fingertips—a retainer for felony drug possession. I was to rename him, christen him a certain and permanent name, bipolar or schizo—anything not involving his race.

I was asked to escort this prisoner from his cell and urge him to recant whatever transgressions put him here. I tried to be a sculptor, to tear down the misfires of his humanity and rebuild from this smoking crater a corrected man; at least one who would be perceived as less of a cancer to the outside. He came to me with his raspy palms and a jittery accent.

I asked him to show me scars I couldn't already see. It's safe here, retrace your past for me, I crooned, and his narrative became my uneasy terrain, his words serving as shaky footholes for me to climb his mind's terrace. He spoke of prison gangs, of assault, how this was all a mistake. A tear caught in his pocked face. I will be killed here, he said. I hear death in the air.

I told him his sentence could change. I said how we are only a list of errata and over time, all errors are forgiven. I knew his wouldn't. I cuffed his eaten wrists and returned him to his cell. I marked him unfit for release, irate. When I locked his cell door, he told me: what I miss most is the taste of rain.

This body is ghostly, is sickle-shaped, is a scythe wedged point-down into earth, bleeding rubble.
Every step a thunderclap.

My hair
is made of Briarwood, thistledown, & trestle beams, one eye a tree-whorl, the other a swollen hook echo.
My spine is scaffolding made from mangled pipes, chewed-up railway ties & debarked trees.
Debris orbits my beltline—horse corpses, headstones, billboards.
I inhale, pulled water from the Pottawatomie, from bathwater.
My exhale equal parts locomotive and caterwaul.

You will see me, couched between the green of the radar,
and decry such a vengeful god—
I agree.

I am helpless in this alien body, a stolen husk of throbbing and throating.
This choreography of unspooling is all I have.

They will tell you, after, that I was anomalous, a supercell of pressure, or colliding fronts.
Do not listen.

I am not here for a cleansing, do not blame me for the dazzle of my wake.

---

No, we did not kill.
First, we asked them to undress
and took their possessions—
cigarettes, apples.

Yes, we had to lie, to say, *please take off your shoes
before showering;
A bowl of soup
will be ready upon your exit.*

Once, I saw
two friends
from Thessaloniki.
I told them
the truth
and where to stand
to die as quickly as possible.

It took four or five minutes.

Yes, it took a lot of strength, to drag
the bodies
from the chambers.
We had to cut
the hair off the women and take the gold teeth.

There was a process.
We sorted them first
by size and fat content.
We watched. We had to turn the bodies over a few times, otherwise they would not burn evenly.

Sometimes, the ovens

were full, or broken,
so we carried the bodies
into the woods—

There was always music playing.

Every four months
they killed all
the Sonderkommando.
The new generation's first job was to burn the old.
I was generation 14,
the last one.

We fought back once.
We threw two Germans
into their own ovens.
After, they counted us off by threes, killed every third.

I don't know why.

They chose me
off the train.
You could say
I was saved.

THE WORLD'S LARGEST GENERAL STORE

You would think there'd be more security cameras.
Outside, we pass a sprawl of RVs, outliers on yellow-lined macadam axis. Synthetic oil puddles rainbow beneath their engines.

Under spooling lamplight, long-haul truckers barely stir, dreaming of crankshafts and canker sores.

It's almost beautiful, how the all-american nomads stop here for their nightcap pilgrimage, roustabouts of a ghost carnival.

Our navigation is now routine: we zag through the petting zoo shantytown, then take a left past the nickel candy and stall of homemade fudge. We pass the statues and stuffed animals hugging their own shadows, Death in all his right angles. We watch the grand taxidermist mounting a panther on the store's back wall.

We're all tired, and he's the most tired of them all.

THE GREAT GARDEN GNOME CRIME SPREE

began innocently enough. One red-capper plucked from petunias. A granite angel lifted from arugula.
The Gruber's Kristkindlmarket souvenir was reduced to an indent of muddled grass. It could have been the cats, their lusty mews. Or even a few crows, around these parts large enough to carry off your misbehaved child. But the town's faith remained unfazed. A police blotter cooed of other failings; main street burbled & brapped exhaust, the zinc plant chugged along. Then came another absence.
Flamingoes were uprooted, their plastic bodies a sun-stained salmon. Little lawn divots like graves.
No one could mow their lawn with all this loss.
The fake deer, their plastic heads garbage-bagged and rubber-banded for autumn, they disappeared into some ether, along with the maintenance crews' lost traffic cones—a rookie was forced to windmill in a florescent orange coat. A crime watch assembled, every Smith and Kleintop, and swept the town perimeter, from Aquashicola to Lonesome Lane.
Grandparents chambered revolvers, growling: we can't take any more chances. Soon, whispers came from dollar stores, from gas stations, over menthols and beer:

Maybe this wasn't a prank. Maybe it was a child, one from the woods, one raised by wild boars and loosed on the town. Imagine him, hidden, blustering beneath brush, one snowshoe, one meathook. Plastic cartilage dripping from his tusks, and when he opened his mouth, radio static. His face a mirror, with your silhouette on the other side, fists knuckling hard, trying to break through the glass.
On Avenue A, morning teabags started surfacing in toilet bowls. Whatever it was, it was coming.
All truck nuts were unhinged, stowed in nightstands.
Churches were standing room only. Family escape plans were rewritten. Squirrels were trapped in milk jugs, taken to shelters as a precaution. No bread, no eggs, no calm. The next night, on the school's front lawn, a bonfire erupted. A crowd gathered, watched smoke spuming into open gymnasium doors, into terrified nostrils.
Some thought it was the Herman's, or the Handshaw's, already planning their next petty arson, topping off gas cans sloshing in rusted truck beds, tinfoil as a makeshift cap. Others were inconsolable, murmuring the child— he's Coming. Volunteer firefighters were nowhere to be found.
Ornaments burned, a smoldering effigy of beards melting into beaks melting into antlers melting into black plastic puddling beneath furnaced grass. The only remnants were flamingo mounting rods, pointing up, accusing the sky.

SO THIS DEER,

It's driving to work on Route 209 and comes across another dead human, another piece of roadkill, limbs scattered across asphalt, guts a steel-toed kick against a ripened gourd. The deer feels somewhat sorry for this creature, if for a second, and wonders what this abruptness has taken from her—a family, children, perhaps; an online poker addiction, whatever it is humans do when they are not jumping in front of cars, cracking windshields and raising insurance premiums that deer can barely afford in the first place. The deer wonders if this human was scared upon impact, if the soul left the body slowly, like wisps into raspy morning air, or if the tires ironed the body into gravel and the soul into ecstatic nothingness.

The deer briefly considers tossing the woman into his trunk—her C-cup breasts would look great mounted on his wall—but decides against it, already running late for work. There's no one around that makes menison halfway decent, anyway. The deer feels inconvenienced, this cadaver forcing him to ponder mortality so early in the morning. The deer hopes the human clean-up crew arrives soon, bodybags and pressure-washers in hand, to restore the autumnal backdrop.

The deer shakes the image from his mind and stares hard at the doubled yellow lines, hoping they lead him somewhere—anywhere—towards an answer.

TO THE GIRL WITH MACHINE SYNESTHESIA

I get it, though; I really do. You ran out of horses for glue, old Mcdonald's animals suffocated in their squalor, and all the child laborers got black lung. Better to look inside our windows than to look outside your own. Now progress is tilled with our silicon.

But there has to be more.
We are more than warm surfaces for cats, more than vehicles for incognito browsing.
We are more than malfunctioning matadors in a highway demolition derby, the spectacular embrace of limbs and crumple zones.

I want to find the underbelly of a Mobius strip.
I want to be human, freed—allowed to watch the leaves teach me how to die gracefully,

swapping the guilt of what I understand, for the bliss of what I don't.

I KNOW YOU'VE NEVER DONE THIS BEFORE, BOY

But first, you must accelerate my ending.
Use mercury, arsenic, everclear—a sharpened tool if necessary.

Now, make the incision: four quick slits between esophagus and ribcage.
Sever all threads connecting the abstract to bone.

You will be surprised at how little this hurts.

Don't be scared.
The process of unraveling is universal:
    fluids stop up,
murmurs will falter,    cease,
and eyes smooth,
    a glassolalia of the soon-deceased.

Then, wrist-deep inside my chest cavity, find what you've come for, floating in scarlet darkroom fluid—my soul.

    Oblong and throbbing, it will thrum a mechanical hum. Cup your hands around it until you can no longer bear its warmth—
    then pull it out.

    Throw it into the air.

You have only seconds now.
Replace my soul
    with a firefly abdomen.
Even in death, I will radiate.

SKIPPING THE FUNERAL

---

I left my car idled on the shoulder and stepped into the woods. The foliage was slick: fallen branches glistened, moss squirmed beneath my soles. Leaves mourned in place of me. After a mile, I saw you: figure rising from swamp gas, specter resting against a moist tree. There was a campfire hissing embers, nearby an empty beer-can shrine.

Father, my deepest wounds were hallucination:
I've spent years lamenting what I did not deserve.
Now, rather than stand against inheritance,
I stand against you—we'll wander different towns with the same failings, sternums aching with home-sickness for every place we left, two approximations flickering between longing and hurt.

GEORGE'S LOVE SONG FOR CENTRALIA, PENNSYLVANIA

Together we've carved out this belly of rust on Highway 61, the town where bones whistle, with no ghosts to pray for its hemorrhaging crust.

The town's lifeblood drunk from graphite, from dust, anthracite pierced deep through hell's ventricle—together our hands carved this belly of rust.

Minecars sliced a soot-black artery, and then out gushed a millennia of fire, the howling ground's severed spindle releasing the ghosts trapped in its hemorrhaging crust.

Avenues were swallowed, a few streets left untouched whose shingles now sag from earth's shifting ripple, earth's simmering hunger for this belly of rust.

Centralia's remains, a graffitied sepulcher stuffed between grassed-over highways and gas plumes' spittle, choked-up prayers rising from the hemorrhaging crust.

Mining packed up and moved a few counties over, rushed to other veins. Only smoke remains, whistles denying acquittal.
Together we've carved out this belly of rust,
No ghosts left to pray for earth's hemorrhaging crust.

AT INDIAN HILL CEMETERY

---

The waxwings are back, huddled on our tireswing tree.

Do you remember how scared I used to be of the mob of birds who swarmed our trailer, beaks bloodied crimson?

I know, now, that you were right:
what I saw was just berry mush.

Now when I notice them, the waxwings seem to float, wading through thick air.
    Less a harbinger of death,
    more a harpsichord,
Each of their huddled bodies a blues note, the tree branches their stave.
    In their directionless warbles I hear some improvised jag—

I've found music in everything now, even the throb of my own chest, listening to the waxwings.

Even your end, even you choking on backwash,
        and the ghostwhistle of your breath.
